There are different qualities that you must acquire for your essay to be graded “A”. Pick a topic relevant to your subject: In other words, you should make sure that the topic suits your intended course. For example, if you're in a course that deals with literature, then the topic "Should Africans be allowed to read foreign scripts?" will not work. Even though it's about your subject; literature, it is not of relevance to your subject. In other words, it does not match up to what the professor expected from you.

Make the topic engaging: If you decide on a boring topic such as ‘Is there anything wrong with plagiarism?’ or “What are legal rights and responsibilities of citizens?”, then most probably your essay will make any reader fall asleep before getting to the end of its first page. It is therefore imperative that you choose an interesting topic and write about it with the skills of a seasoned writer.

A strong thesis statement: Your essay will only be graded “A” if your thesis is clear, concise, and perfectly relevant to the topic at hand. If you have not done this well, then there’s no hope for your paper to receive an A grade regardless of how well written it is. You can get a freelancer to write my essay.

Interesting topic sentences: As opposed to writing boring sentences that sound like bullet points, make sure that you include interesting information in your topic sentences thereby making them worth reading.

You may do this by including quotes from books or movies, including famous persons who are related to the topic being discussed, or using humor and emotions as triggers to engage the reader.

End with a course of action: It is essential that you end your essay by providing solutions and ways forward to the problems tackled in your paper.

That means, even if you were writing about the right to education; it’s good to conclude by saying how this “right” can be achieved through some courses of actions such as petitioning the government or meeting with local leaders who have the authority in implementing policies on improving educational standards.

This article concludes by saying that these qualities are essential for your essay to be considered worthy of an A grade.
